Thought Provoking and Informative

Just a short note to tell you how much I appreciate the very fine issue of THE JOURNAL OF ADVENTIST EDUCATION which I just received at my desk this morning. I truly appreciate the new look and the fine set of thought-provoking and informative articles contained in the December 1986-January 1987 issue of the JOURNAL.

Even Better

I like the new design of THE JOURNAL OF ADVENTIST EDUCATION! Clean and bold, it beckons the reader. Congratulations on making a fine journal even better!

Helping Children Cope With Grief

The article on "Helping Children Cope With Death and Tragedy" (Summer 1986) was excellent.

The best part was the point-by-point methods adults can use to help their charges. Both teachers and parents can benefit from the ideas in this article. In addition to offering ways for adults to help children through crises, the article effectively brought out ways to deal with children in general.

The article was done not only with intellectual thoroughness, but also with obvious emotional sensitivity. These are not easily combined when discussing such an important and sensitive issue.

In his latest book, Roger Dudley reveals research that compares the moral maturity of Adventist high school seniors with their non-Adventist peers. The findings are shocking.

Have those hours of instruction in the home, school, and church resulted in kids who act nice enough but have no moral backbone?

Passing On the Torch marks those teaching methods that leave young people morally stagnant. Handing down our spiritual values like so many cut flowers doesn't work.

But the author has good news. We can help young people grow values of their own. He demonstrates exercises that help young people examine their values, choose between values, and prize the values they choose as much as any of their personal possessions.

Passing On the Torch offers intelligent advice on how to raise a generation of Christians who are "strong to think and to act." Order it from your Adventist Book Center. Hardcover, 191 pages. US$12.95.
